hubris12000, You continue to confuse your opinions with facts. They aren't the same thing. When are you going to figure that out?OATS hasn't made any profit--that is why they aren't worth very much. They weren't worth very much either before Ron Burkle bought into the company fueling takeover speculation and driving the stock up.In contrast to OATS which has lost huge amounts of money, Whole Foods is the most profitable public food retailing company in the United States. It has the highest growth rate, the highest same store sales, the highest profit percentage, and the highest sales per sq. ft.--all by factors of several hundreds of percent. These are facts hubris. Provide contrary evidence to what I just said. Whole Foods has a hugely successful business model by all objective financial measurements there are. OATS does not.I never said that there was no risk to Whole Foods associated with Wal-Mart selling organic foods. Read my posts, don't project your own interpretations on to what I didn't say. However, IMO the benefits of Wal-Mart selling organic foods to Whole Foods outweigh the risks because it is going to create greater awareness, increased supply over the long-term and lower prices--all which will benefit Whole Foods, who has the dominant brand in this business. In addition, as I have said before but which you seem incapable of fully grasping--Whole Foods isn't primarily about organic foods. It never has been. Organic foods is only one part of its highly successful business model. High quality perishable foods (both commercial and organic) is the key to its business model--produce, meat, seafood, bakery, prepared foods. This is over 70% of Whole Foods total sales. Wal-Mart doesn't sell high quality perishables and neither does Trader Joe's while we are on the subject. That is why Whole Foods coexists so well with TJ's and it is also why Wal-Mart isn't going to hurt Whole Foods.Time to update how much longer
