

Ms. Alexis Chisholm

N/A

United States

The first part of this rule that states that each of the organizations that fall under this regulation should use the appropriate means of disposal. This seems a bit unfair to some of the organizations. The service for getting rid of these documents should be similar for every organization regardless of whether some things are more sensitive than others. This cannot be determinant upon whose company has more classified information because in actuality all information is equally sensitive and any information can be used for consumer fraud. There is a part of the regulation that states that the way of disposal will be determinant upon the "sensitivity of the information at issue." Who will decide whether something is sensitive or not? And will that person be reliable enough not to commit identity theft. At the end, the regulations states that it wants to minimize the rules for smaller organizations. How will this part work? No one person's credit is not more important than someone else's. I believe that this is an important regulation but you cannot say that one organization can do something different than another. All regulations should be the same for every organization. Also, all information needs to be disposed of the same by making the process standardized instead of customized to each organization because of the risk of someone deciding the sensitivity level of the information.